A real rough-water ride to remember

Winds whip around canoes, but racers revel in experience

The squall approached from the northeast, gray and ominous, as our outrigger canoe plunged through the Pacific, out of sight of land.

The third Na Holo Kai Sailing Canoe Race last Saturday was the first with serious wind.

The canoes lay spread out on the beach at Puka Bay. With the 5 a.m. start and a cheer, the crews pushed them into the sea, and took up paddles. The crews paddled under a nearly full moon out of the lee of Oahu, bound for Nawiliwili.

The Kauai channel is the state's widest, at 72 miles more than double the big Aleianahua. The Puka start added more than 10 miles.

Twenty-one canoes started officially, and one followed unofficially. The craft spread out as captains sailed their own courses. Soon, all we could see were the white lights of the escort boats.

With daylight, and passing Kaena Point, came the wind, and the canoes sped across the sea. Several hours into the race, Oahu disappeared into the misty ashen. Kauai had not yet appeared.

In our canoe, when the wind hit, first tentatively and then with a whistling conviction, the sail grabbed it and our canoe lunged with an acceleration that knocked us back in our seats.

The long, narrow bow rose up the backs of swells and buried itself in the troughs. What we did not know then was that the stress of the pounding created cracks in the bow air chamber. It was leaking and with each immersion was taking on water.

The wind out of the squall caught us. We felt the second major blast of acceleration. Our Hui Mokihana crew, five men and one woman, momentarily stunned by the unaccustomed speed, broke into whoops of delight. After months of practice, this was why we were here.

We surfed swell after swell. Steersmen in various canoes struggled to hold their canoes on course, snapping paddles like crossticks, weighing the desire for more speed against the danger of burying their hulls.

There is an easy camaraderie among outrigger canoe sailors as they work to develop this new Hawaiian sport whose origins lie in the dim reaches of the Polynesian past.

It is probably the most fun sports event in Hawaii, sailing, surfing and you're so close to the water," said Mike Spaulding, of the winning canoe, of Maui Canoe Sailing Association.

The Maui Canoe Sailing Association finished in 7 hours, 47 minutes, 50 seconds — taking 2 1/2 hours off its winning time last year (10:16:17) and 1 1/2 hours off the previous race record (9:17:44) held by Hanalei Canoe Club on a course a quarter-mile shorter. For our crew, Hui Mokihana,
