More than one way to use a surfboard

There are several books devoted to surfing, but unfortunately, nothing much has been written about its companion — surfboard paddling.

Hawaii's contribution to surfing — its professional winter surf meets and the fact that there is always a rideable wave breaking somewhere around the Islands — is well known. But did you know that when the surf is flat, there's something else to do with a board besides stand on the beach and pray for waves?

Well, there is. Sunday, the Hui O He'e Nalu, a 100-member surf club made up predominantly of North Shore surfers and lifeguards, will sponsor its annual Independence Day Paddleboard Race from Sunset Beach to Waimea Bay starting at 11 a.m.

The water along the course is flat, the distance is approximately three miles, and the entry fee is $3.

"We won't know until the day of the race how many are entered, but we're the largest (race) in the Islands. Last year we had 65," race director Mark Cunningham said. "This will be the fourth year we've held the event."

Surfers know that you have to be able to paddle a board to get out to and into the waves. "Historically, we theorize that paddling is as old as surfing, because surfers raced each other going out to catch waves," said Fred Hemmings, author of "Surfing: Hawaii's Gift to the World of Sports."

"There is some documentation of paddleboard racing in the 1920s and '30s, and it was rejuvenated in the '50s with a race in Waikiki on Christmas Day hosted by the Waikiki Surf Club," Hemmings said. "It was held in conjunction with the Makaha International Surfing Championships, the original major international surfing championship of its day."

Paddleboard racing peaked in the mid-'50s, both in Hawaii and California. Although at least five men have paddled boards across the Molokai channel, California was host for the longest race, an annual 26-mile summer race from Catalina Island to the Manhattan Beach pier (in Southern California). Originated by Los Angeles County lifeguard Bob Hogan, it drew top names in paddling from Hawaii and the Mainland, including Tommy Zahn, Joe Quigg and George Downing. Downing completed the race but after nearly seven hours in the cold water, he vowed never to enter again.

Some think the reason the sport died is because two classes of boards were used, stock and open. Stock meant a standard large surfboard while open meant anything from long, expensive glider-construction type models to fiberglass needles. The fiberglass boards had kneeling wells, rudders and sprayshields that easily outdistanced and discouraged those entered in the less expensive stock class.

Then, about five years ago, Hemmings, John Cline-Mann and Joe Quigg decided to rekindle interest by initiating some races and rules standardizing both course and board.

Today's courses run 10,000 meters and boards must be 12 feet or less and weigh more than 20 pounds. That means anyone can purchase a 12-foot foam blank and make an inexpensive competitive board.

The board length rule applies to Sunday's North Shore contest.

There are four races held annually in Hawaii — the Independence Day race and three others for which the Outrigger Canoe Club serves as host under the direction of Dale Hope. OCC's races are in June, mid-August and late December.

The idea of paddleboard racing is simply either to kneel or lie prone and (with or without waves), paddle from one point to another. It takes balance, skill and training, but even for the unskilled it can be a lot of fun and a challenging contest.

"The Fourth of July contest got started as a way to give all the North Shore surfers something to train for during the summer doldrums when there isn't any surf," Cunningham said. "But it is open to everyone."

The fastest time is 29 minutes, 51 seconds, set by Kiki Spangler on an open board in 1979. Brett Goodfriend is the defending champion in the 12-foot class with a 34:44.

There will be three divisions — men's 18-and-older; junior men's 17-and-under and a women's division. Check-in and entry are acceptable until the start of the race.
