

Surf Spray

by Ron Haworth

Hemmings takes it all

The World Surfing Championships gold cup was brought to Hawaii for the first time yesterday by husky Fred Hemmings.

Hemmings, who evidently found the unfamiliar surf of Puerto Rico much to his liking, wrote prior to his biggest win in surf competition:

"Things here are similar to Hawaii—warm water, humid days with afternoon onshore breezes. The best surf has been four feet at a spot called Domes.

"Sorry the surf hasn't been better, but we're all very proud our wahines did so well, and I'm proud to be representing Hawaii and the Outrigger Canoe Club."

Without Hemmings Hawaii would have again looked bad in comparison with Australia who took second, third and fourth in a fine team effort.

Tough luck for Downing

While it's not pleasant to read of any Hawaiian being eliminated from the World Surfing Championships, it is especially disheartening when that individual is George Downing.

And quite naturally, Downing wanted very much to win. But while his value to the Hawaii team was beyond reproach in the water, he also had a value out of the water—perhaps more so than anyone realizes.

He was, in fact, the team coach, a position which carried more responsibility than a mere title. Young surfers like Clyde Aikau and Jimmy Blears, two on the squad, could pick up tips from Downing's vast experiences.

It's hard to talk to Downing without coming away enriched with surf knowledge. His eyes have seen too much; and his memory has retained most of it.

Two years ago the WEC were held in San Diego and Downing went along as coach. It was a first in a sport never before sophisticated enough to warrant even an amateur coach.

The statistics of that contest give no hint as to the drama which surrounded the outcome, and few know the vital part played by Downing in getting a second-place finish for Jock Sutherland an a speck of prestige for Hawaii.

Going into that final day of the three-day competition, Young of Australia had already amassed enough points to win due to some strange scoring rules.

But the next spots were up for grabs. In the running were three "lefties"—Sutherland, Corky Carroll and David Nuuhiwa. Nuuhiwa had led the pack after the first day, but fared very badly the next when he was forced to surf right.

Ideal for 'righties'

The site for that final day was Ocean Beach, again known for its right slide more than a left. The direction a wave peels and offers the best conditions is what makes a particular spot liked by individual surfers.

Goofy-footers are at their best going left where they can face into the wave. The average surfer has his left foot leading and looks away from the wave.

All three in contention for second spot were goofy-footers caught in an unfavorable situation that favored a right slide. And of the three, Sutherland was the best "switch-footer."

Coach Downing knew this. And he also knew that surfers do not win always by ability alone. Many things enter into producing a victory.

Surveying the situation, Downing saw that the left break was uncommonly good, maybe even better than the right. But he also realized that the judging towers had been placed with the right slide in mind.

Under the existing set-up a judge would find it impossible to evaluate a ride to the left. So Downing went to work.

First he used Hawaiian persuasion on the officials to get one tower moved up the beach, and when the labor was not quickly forthcoming, Downing commandeered a work crew from the ranks of spectators.

Strategy works

Then he drew Sutherland aside and pointed out the merit of surfing left, instead of banging heads with already-a-winner Young, who preferred rights.

A later study of the scorecards proved out Downing's wisdom. Sutherland did well, while Carroll and Nuuhiwa flopped.

We'll never know how Sutherland would have fared on the right slides, certainly no better than his second-place finish, and likely not as well.

Hemmings Rides to Surf Crown

RINCON, Puerto Rico (UPI)—Fred Hemmings of Hawaii became the men's world surfing champion at Rincon Beach yesterday when he narrowly won a six-man, all-Pacific-Ocean final heat consisting of three Australians, two Hawaiians and one Californian.

The ocean, uncooperative all week, produced waves over eight feet to provide a good surfing day and end the fourth World's Surfing Championships on a pleasant note.

Hemmings' win brought the title under the U.S. flag for the first time. It previously was held by Midget Farrelly of Australia, Felipe Pomar of Peru and most recently by Nat Young of Australia.

The contest was close. Using the best seven waves of each surfer, the 22-year-old Hemmings ended up in a tie for first place with Farrelly.

To break the tie, the eighth best wave was considered, and Hemmings was the winner with 326 points, only two more than Farrelly.

It was a tough loss for Farrelly, who surfed well and came close to being the first two-time champion in the contest's history.

But Hemmings, coming from the large waves of Hawaii, found the eight-foot surf of Rincon to his liking.

Hawaiian George Downing had predicted earlier in the week that his team would do well if the surf ran at least six to eight feet and he was right.

Third behind Farrelly was Russell Hughes of Australia. Fourth was defending champion Young, fifth was Mike Doyle of California and sixth was Reno Abellira of Hawaii.

The quarterfinals and semifinals were run off earlier at Domes Beach on the grounds of the nuclear power plant here.

Australian Wayne Lynch was eliminated in the semifinals, and his teammate Keith Paull was eliminated in the quarterfinals.

Hawaiian Joey Cabell was eliminated in the semifinals.

Hawaiians Clyde Aikau and Ben Aipa were eliminated in the quarterfinals.

New champ--Hemmings

RINCON, Puerto Rico (UPI)—Fred Hemmings of Hawaii captured the men's world surfing champion at Rincon Beach yesterday when he narrowly took a six-man, all-Pacific Ocean final heat consisting of three Australians, two Hawaiians and one Californian.

The ocean, uncooperative all week, produced waves of over eight feet to provide a good surfing day and end the fourth World's Surfing Championships on a pleasant note.

Hemmings' win brought the title to the U.S. for the first time. It previously was held by Midget Farrelly of Australia, Felipe Pomar of Peru and most recently by Nat Young of Australia.

The contest was close. Using the best seven waves of each surfer, the 22-year-old Hemmings ended up in a tie for first place with Farrelly.

To break the tie, the eighth best wave was considered, and Hemmings was the winner with 326 points, only two more than Farrelly.

It was a tough loss for Farrelly, who surfed well and came close to being the first two-time champion in the contest's history.

But Hemmings, coming from the large waves of Hawaii, found the eight-foot surf of Rincon to his liking. Hawaiian coach George Downing had predicted earlier in the week that his team would do well if the surf ran at least six to eight feet and he was right.

Third behind Farrelly was Russell Hughes of Australia. Fourth was defending champion Young, fifth Mike Doyle of California and sixth Rino Abellira of Hawaii.

The quarter-finals and semifinals were run off earlier at Domes Beach on the grounds of the nuclear power plant here.

Australian Wayne Lynch was eliminated in the semifinals, and his teammate Keith Paull was eliminated in the quarter-finals.

Hawaiian Joey Cabell was eliminated in the semifinals. Hawaiians Clyde Aikau and Ben Aipa were eliminated in the quarter-finals.

Fred Hemmings Jr.

Fred Hemmings nosed out Midget Farrelly of Australia on eighth wave to win the world surfing championship at Puerto Rico yesterday.